Herein we report a novel polyacetylene derivative with naphthalimide (NI) as an aggregation-induced emission (AIE) material for light-induced anti-cancer therapy. The results of photo-physical and cytotoxicity investigations revealed that the polyacetylene derivative (PN) in aqueous medium exhibited a typical excimer emission at 535 nm under irradiation. The PN-AIE-based cytotoxicity studies suggested that PN could effectively induce apoptosis in cancer cells, accompanied with significant intracellular ROS overproduction. The experimental results also indicated that PN could inhibit the proliferation of cancer cells and promote apoptosis through an ROS-dependent mitochondria-mediated pathway. These findings provide a novel light-responsive polyacetylene derivative with AIE property as a promising candidate for anti-cancer drug development.
